Dredge spoils have become a major environmental concern in coastal areas, and they present a major management issue because, in spite of their origin, it is desirable to reuse them for many purposes, including landscaping and erosion control. In many cases, they contain high concentrations of nutrients (N and P), which have accumulated as a result of human activities in adjacent agricultural and estuarine watersheds. These nutrients, if permitted to enter the surrounding environment, pose a risk to coastal ecosystems. There are a few approaches to the containment and remediation of dredge spoils: genetic engineering, phytoremediation, nitrification/denitrification, biopiling, and land reclamation. None of these methods are fully accepted as effective or economical. There is a need for an acceptable cost-effective approach to effective nutrient control and neutralization. One such approach is the construction of herbaceous "swales" in which dredge spoil is used as the herbaceous medium. When the herbaceous medium is provided in amounts that insure plant cover, there is potential for nutrient removal from the spoils. This article presents data from a pilot study that demonstrates, in a laboratory scale, the growth of water lily in the dredge spoil and the positive relationships between water lily growth and nutrients (N, P, and micronutrients) in the biomass. A portion of the water lily biomass was used for production of essential oil. This oil has potential use as a herbicide and insecticide. These data are consistent with the hypothesis that grasses can remove nutrients from dredge spoils. Grass in low cover, as in typical herbaceous swales, is not effective in nutrient removal. Grass growth in higher cover would lead to the production of much greater quantities of biomass and therefore more nutrients available for removal. Grass is a better and more effective source of nutrients than dredge spoil. It is also much more effective in the growing of water lily.
